In 1328, the Black Death took hold of Europe and did not let go for the next twenty years. As hundreds of millions succumbed to it and the medical community had no effective treatment, people began experimenting with odd techniques in a desperate attempt to stave off the pandemic. Some believed that pleasant odors could block the sickness, so they carried around sweet-smelling flowers or herbs.

But the only effect this had was to make a person smell nice for a time. A less enjoyable practice that a few opted for was to live in a sewer because it was thought that the air underground had not been contaminated by the disease. Naturally, it did nothing for the poor people who decided to go under; in fact, it only caused them to come down with more diseases due to the unsanitary conditions.

Furthermore, it is very unlikely that indigenous cultures can sustain their traditional ways of life in the face of tourist dollars that give them access to an appealing new world.

All of us want to be happier, but we don't always know how. Although there isn't a single formula to achieve this, there are some methods that seem to do the trick. Actively trying to be happy is a good way to start.

Smile even when you're feeling blue and you'll notice that you begin to feel better. And did you know that money can buy happiness, but only if you spend it on others? Altruism and charity are guaranteed to boost your levels of contentment. In our tech-infused world, it's also crucial to unplug now and again; remember, your cell phones and computers have "off" buttons. Most of all, learn to let go once in a while. Those with an overly regimented lifestyle have little chance to experience the pleasures to be had from spontaneity and indulgence.

No one can deny its aesthetic beauty, but what most don't know is that 45 percent of the building is made from recycled materials. Becker is part of a growing group of designers who appreciate discarded goods. While it does serve to conserve the environment, Becker says he reuses materials for more selfish reasons. With young talent being such a valuable commodity in the entertainment industry, there is no shortage of kids lining up for auditions, in the hopes of becoming stars. But being so young, these children are apt to head down the wrong path if they don't have a firm hand to guide them. The young star of the movie Too Many Days proved this by making head-lines recently when he was jailed for drunk driving. While the public was quick to criticize him for throwing away his career, Penny Graham felt only sympathy for the poor boy. "Whether or not you make it in this business really depends on who watches over you," says the former child star. "The guardians of child actors play a crucial role. When you get rich and famous that young, it's easy to lose control. They're the ones that need to set boundaries and let you know when to stop."
